Integrating the 4 P's

- An integrated marketing mix is one which combines each element in the best possible way
- A change in one element can have a significant impact on the others
- An integrated marketing mix can help build a competitive advantage
- By creating a cohesive marketing strategy that resonates with customers, the business is set apart from its competitors

How changes to one element can change the entire mix

Changes to the product	Changes to price

• The product/service is at the heart of the marketing mix, as it is what the customer is buying
  ○ The product determines the price, the target audience, and the promotion strategy
• If the product changes, then all other elements of the mix will likely need to change
  ○ For example, if a business decides to launch a premium version of its product, it may need to increase the price, target a different audience and use a different promotion strategy to reflect the new product's value
	• The price of a product is closely linked to its perceived brand value
	  ○ If a product is priced too high, it may be perceived as too expensive by the target audience, leading to lower sales
	  ○ If a product is priced too low, it may be perceived as low quality, leading to lower sales
	• Increasing the price may require changes to the promotion strategy, which are aimed at convincing consumers of the product's value

• The chosen promotion strategy can affect price and distribution channels
  ○ For example, if a business decides to launch a high-end promotion strategy, it may need to increase the price to reflect the product's value
	• The chosen distribution channels can affect the price and promotion strategy
	  ○ For example, if a business decides to use exclusive distribution channels, it may need to increase the price to reflect the exclusivity of the product
