Blues for an Alabama Sky: Historical context

The Harlem Renaissance

- The 1920s in New York City were known as the Harlem Renaissance:
  - This was a period of time where Black musicians, artists, writers and other creatives thrived and flourished
  - Although there was still discrimination, this meant that Black culture and identity was celebrated in ways it had not been before
- In the 1930s, when the play is set, the boom period was on a downswing:
  - The Stock Market Crash of 1929 and the Great Depression hastened the decline of the Renaissance, with harsh realities of economic struggles biting at a once thriving creative scene
  - Wealthy patrons departed, and with them went many of the talented residents of Harlem

The Great Depression

- After the Stock Market Crash of 1929, the Great Depression took hold of America:
  - The Wall Street stock market crash caused a worldwide economic collapse
- There was massive unemployment and poverty:
  - At its peak, around 25 per cent of Americans were out of work
  - This led to widespread poverty, as families struggled to afford food, rent and other basic necessities
  - Many moved in search of work, including both rural families and urban workers
- The boom of the Harlem Renaissance depended on jobs and disposable income that could be spent on clubs, theatres and other venues:
  - This led to closures of venues and declining opportunities
  - Artists then left Harlem to work elsewhere

The Harlem Renaissance	Both Josephine Baker and Langston Hughes are referenced as friends or acquaintances of the main characters in the play. Baker and Hughes were two prominent and famous figures of the Harlem Renaissance, showing the links of the play's characters to it. Josephine having left, and Langston returning but having been away, are signs that two key figures looked elsewhere to stay afloat at this time.
	Guy and Angel face struggles as work dries up for them. They represent the survivors of this time, and their dreams are ones that were more possible and inspired in the 1920s. Delia starts a clinic that may well have succeeded ten years prior, but now faces challenges of a culture that has regressed. With the Renaissance over, Harlem's artistic scene begins to collapse, and economic instability takes over.
The Great Depression	The play is set in Harlem in 1930, right as the Great Depression is beginning, and the characters feel its impact immediately. Angel and Guy are struggling to find steady work in entertainment, and the nightlife that once supported their dreams is shrinking. Economic stress heightens tensions around identity, gender, sexuality, and morality, and the uncertainty makes the characters more desperate for stability, for escape, for opportunity.

	job at the same time and has to pick up odd jobs. They are close to being evicted when Guy gets his job offer from Paris, a sign of how things changed for Black creatives in Harlem.
	With economic stress causing rifts and instability, views like Leland's become more prominent. It is easy for them to cast this Depression as punishment for the sins of the Renaissance.

Blues for an Alabama Sky: Social context

Migration and Identity

- The great migration saw millions of African Americans move from the rural South to northern cities like New York between 1916–1970:
  - These migrants were moving in search of safety, better jobs, cultural freedom and a freer sense of identity
  - Harlem became a centre of Black artistic and intellectual life
  - This helped shape a new, modern Black identity in America, one that felt confident to embrace its creativity, self-expression and community
- This migration saw many different cultures mix, and saw their values and expectations come together:
  - This could provoke adaptation and change, but also saw clashes
- New arrivals often brought with them traditional, conservative beliefs rooted in Southern life:
  - This contrasted with established Harlem beliefs and ideas
  - Harlem residents were largely immersed in the progressive environment of the Renaissance
- With progressive, modern views facing conservative, traditional ones there were tensions around religion, sexuality, ambition, and identity

Women's autonomy and reproductive rights

- The 1920s and 1930s were a turning point for reproductive rights, but legal restrictions were still extremely tight:
  - It was illegal in New York state at the time to distribute birth control information
  - Abortion was criminalised throughout the US in the 1930s
  - The economic hardship of the Great Depression made pregnancy difficult, and the pressure to avoid

    - There were a large number of deaths and complications from unsafe abortions
- Despite the restrictions, Harlem became one of the most active centres for birth control advocacy in the US
- In 1930, birth-control pioneer Margaret Sanger founded the Harlem Clinic, the first birth-control clinic in New York that specifically served Black women:
    - It was created with community cooperation, including Black nurses, social workers, and the National Urban League
    - Sanger recognised that Black women faced greater barriers than white women

Migration and identity	Leland represents a traditional Southern man of the time and the conflict in beliefs with those living in Harlem. His views on religion, gender, and sexuality come directly from his life in Alabama. When he arrives in Harlem, he is disoriented by the modernity, freedom, and artistic expression around him. This creates tension, especially as Leland is not shy in his views and believes himself completely right.
	Guy's confident identity represents the new Harlem. He is expressive, artistic, and openly gay, and he is shaped by the community around him.
	Angel is closer to Guy in terms of her worldview but gravitates towards Leland. She shows how economic instability leads people to sacrifice their identities. The fracturing of the chosen family unit symbolises the social reality of their situation: the clash of migrant conservatism with Harlem modernity is shown to tear communities apart.
Women's autonomy and reproductive rights	Through Delia, Cleage links Harlem's progress to a wider national struggle. By grounding Delia in the history of Sanger's movement, the play shows that Harlem was also a site of bold, progressive activism by women. The backlash Delia faces mirrors the real backlash Sanger encountered. The burning of Delia's clinic reflects this hostility, particularly from conservative and religious groups.
	Sam's role as a doctor aligns with the progressive medical professionals in Harlem who worked to provide safe reproductive care for women. His belief that women deserve medical dignity and consequences of conservative resistance to women's autonomy.

	Angel's pregnancy becomes a central point of conflict around issues of bodily autonomy. Her decision not to have the baby shows her asserting control over her own body. Leland sees women's bodies as governed by religious morality, reflecting conservative community views of pregnancy, marriage, and sexuality as moral obligations rather than personal choice.

Blues for an Alabama Sky: Literary context

The end of the Harlem Renaissance

- The play is set at the end of the Harlem Renaissance:
  - This was a period when Black writers, musicians, artists, and thinkers reshaped American culture
  - Figures like Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Alain Locke, Josephine Baker, and Duke Ellington transformed literature, performance, music, and political thought
- By 1930, the Harlem Renaissance literary boom was fading, and writers were confronting the limits of the movement:
  - Authors like Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston were moving from optimism to works that questioned whether art alone could change Black life
- Renaissance literature had been defined by self-expression, experimentation, and Black modernity:
  - Its decline led to works that were more grounded, realist, and concerned with economic hardship

Rise of realist drama

- In the early 20th century, Black playwrights moved towards realistic, character-centred drama:
  - This pushed back against minstrel stereotypes and melodrama
  - Writers like Willis Richardson started to produce one-act plays and domestic dramas focused on everyday relationships
- In this type of drama, characters drive the narrative, not plot twists:
  - Plays looked to show how ordinary Black lives reveal deeper cultural tensions
  - By keying into the problems real Black audiences were facing, the characters and the story are relatable

through ordinary moments

- The play centres around complex Black characters:
  - Realist writers insisted Black characters deserved the same psychological depth as the white characters found in mainstream American realism

The end of the Harlem Renaissance	Cleage draws directly on this artistic legacy. Guy's work in fashion design, Angel's career as a nightclub performer, and the vibrant community setting reflect the creative energy of Harlem. The decline of this movement is a major thematic backdrop, shaping the characters' fears, hopes, and artistic identities.
	The play reflects the turn from celebration to uncertainty. This mirrors how the literature of the period began to show exhaustion in the movement. We see how the play starts with characters who are all about their freedom and self-expression. By the end, it becomes a gritty and tragic portrayal of how the Depression had made life challenging for the ordinary residents of Harlem.
Rise of realist drama	Cleage focuses on the ordinary struggles of a typical group of friends. The play is kept grounded through the use of a single apartment-building setting, naturalistic dialogue, and the mention of real-life figures. All of this is reflective of early realist traditions that began to dominate Black theatre.
	The play uses the characters to tell the story, with the narrative emerging through friendship, work, money, and the ordinary rigours of life. The key themes and plot points come through characters and normality. Reproductive rights emerge through Delia's clinic planning, homophobia is explored via Guy's assault, and conservatism is expressed through Leland's reactions to daily life in the apartment.
	Cleage continues the realist tradition of centering the play around complex characters. Angel, Guy, Delia, Sam, and Leland are given complex motivations, private fears, layered identities, and conflicting values.
